forces," Broadwater said. "While I have worked with a number of joint special operations task forces over the years, CJTF-HOA has been at the top for cooperation among the services, camaraderie and esprit."

The "one team, one fight" mentality extends beyond the dirt-filled barriers that surround the camp. The task force also works regularly with other government organizations in the area to exchange knowledge and someday put an end to the war on terrorism.

"The only way we are going to win the war on terrorism is through interagency partnership," said the CJTF-HOA commander. "We work with other agencies, we share information with each other, we share intelligence with each other, we find that there are places that we can do things that benefit them, and there are places they can do things that benefit us. We are only successful through a collaborative effort."

A senior naval officer who served here with the Expeditionary Medical Unit's surgical section agreed that success is gained only by working together. He attributed much of the success to the relationships with the coalition partners here, but said recent technological advances also play a large role.

"The jointness of efforts in CJTF-HOA has helped to create an area of responsibility with very few safe havens for terrorists. Between the airspace, the oceans and the host nation landmass within the Horn of Africa, there are few places where terrorists can hide," said Navy Capt. Jeffrey W. Paulson, CJTF-HOA surgeon. "With both our coalition partners support and the support of modern technology, we have a tremendous capability to know where the bad guys are and what they are doing. That knowledge advantage is itself a deterrent to terrorist activities in the Horn of Africa."

Robeson said he and his staff realize the Global War on Terrorism will be long and difficult, but it is a fight each member of Combined Joint Task Force-Horn of Africa is prepared to fight for their duration here.

Service members play baseball at the boy's orphanage recently. The orphanages are an excellent opportunity to contribute to the development of youngsters in the local community.
